What a funny little town. You're not sure how to explain what you saw, and like any good scientist, you are not content in letting mysteries remain mysteries. Perhaps studying the "supernatural" more deeply will give you greater insight to the town and the source of the plague

You had a dream the night before the plague. Which is rather odd, since you're fairly certain you were bleeding to death that same night. Perhaps it had been a near-death experience. The warm darkness, the softness of your childhood bed, and the smell of old books, all gone in a sudden burst of light—it does sound like a near-death experience. Victoria must have some incredible healing talents that you are not aware of. Perhaps you should inquire about it.

You recall hearing of earth spirits that once nourished the earth. The townsfolk used to sacrifice bulls and humans to the earth to heal their sick. You dismissed it as superstition at first, but recent events make you wonder. Could this disease be a revenge of the land? Sounds terribly ridiculous when you put it that way. You are a doctor, not an environmentalist. You can't fix the land right now even if it is the cause of the plague. Best leave that to the army. For now, you'll focus on helping the infected.

You have a broad, rigorous mind, but all these inexplicable happenings are stretching it quite thin. What would you not do for some good old whiskey?

Due to stress, you are a bit more irritable than usual. Complain about the town to three people

This Klara child strikes you as rather odd. You feel a kindred spirit, as if she were a sister. It can't be true. You're an only child. The child is likely using some form of hypnotism, or perhaps even magic. You're rational, not obstinate. You might be willing to accept the supernatural if you see more proof. But until then, keep an eye on the child.

You remember now. You dreamed of Death that night. You were in the applewood kitchen from your childhood, tinkering with your grandmother's samovar, trying to recall the taste of black tea and blueberry jam on a winter evening. Death called it a gift. You were his enemy for so long, yet he held no grudges. He was gracious enough to let you have this moment before you had to leave with him. You refused to die, but he only laughed. You cannot recall his appearance or if he even had a body to laugh with. You simply remember the twisting, nails-in-the-heart feeling of being laughed at—an all too familiar feeling that set your mind on fire.

A flash of light broke the scene. You were sinking into warm sand, yet you felt no panic. The earth was a goose down blanket, and the wind, a lover's voice. You closed your heavy eyes, and woke up with Victoria by your side.

Were you truly dead? Did you defeat Death somehow? Did Victoria help you? Your wounds closed awfully fast, and the recent events are forcing you to consider resurrection as a possibility. What has become of you? What is going on? So many others have died and not come back. Why you?

Hypnotism, resurrection, spirits and plagues. It makes no sense. But it has to. You're a seeker of truth. But perhaps you need time. Perhaps this is too much. Perhaps you need a different place to process this, somewhere that isn't surrounded by death and disease. Yet, yet...

This is too much. All this death. All this magic. Your work. Your life. Which is the lie? Which is the truth? What is your fault? What is God's? You can't deny what's in front of you, yet you can't explain anything. What is happening? What is wrong with this town? This is hopeless. What good are you as a scientist if you can't explain anything? How can you fight what you can't understand?

You are suffering a catastrophic mental breakdown. Discard your research notebook on curing the plague; you are too stressed to make progress on it or share your results. Your belief score cannot go down and your breakdown will last the entire rest of the game. Roleplay accordingly.
